

O contributors

◀ You wouldn't think a Grammy-winning singer and Oscar-nominated actress would be afraid to perform for a few relatives, but Queen Latifah is one star who's more comfortable in front of a large audience. "When I was little, my family would ask me to do imitations of commercials because I was good at it, but I was shy because I could see them staring right at me," says Latifah, who stars with John Travolta and Michelle Pfeiffer in this summer's remake of Hairspray. "I found that in front of a big crowd, I could ignore the stares." In her aha moment (page 53), she tells us how she first found her confidence onstage.

▶ Violet Blue's career as a sex educator and brazen blogger hasn't made her immune from typical hang-ups.

"If my boyfriend says something explicit between the sheets, I blush and lose all ability to speak," says the

San Francisco resident, who writes about why women should watch more pornography in "Tuned In, Turned On" (page 186). "It's culturally acceptable for boys to grow up with sexual imagery—think of the stereotypical stack of Dad's Playboys—but girls don't have that comfort level," she says. "So we've got a bit of catching up to do."

Blue's podcast, Open Source Sex, is one of the most popular adult programs on iTunes.

◀ For our preview of Sarah Jessica Parker's first-ever fashion line ("The Miracle Worker," page 190), makeup artist Jamie Melbourne gave our "real women" models a natural look that would match the clothes' simple yet sophisticated style. "I avoided foundation and just used blushes, lipcolor, and mascara with a light eyeliner," says Melbourne. A native of Jamaica, he got his start on the set of Quentin Tarantino's Reservoir Dogs through a friend who happened to be Geena Davis's hairstylist. Later he was hired by François Nars—creator of his own cosmetic line—to work backstage at fashion shows for Gianni Versace and Dolce & Gabbana. He lives in New York with his partner and their 13-year-old English cocker spaniel.

▲ "I believed it was possible to get over my shyness. And belief is a decision, really," says writer Beverly Donofrio, who details how she overcame her introversion with hypnosis in "Relax.... You...Are...Getting... Bolder!" (page 176). She is now considering joining a monastery. "I can retreat and know that it isn't about avoidance," says Donofrio, who rediscovered her faith in recent years. The author of the memoir Riding in Cars with Boys (William Morrow), Donofrio lives in San Miguel de Allende, Mexico. Her first children's book, Mary and the Mouse, the Mouse and Mary (Random House), will be published in September.

[CONTINUED ON PAGE 22]

Eyes

Wide open

What kind of woman watches porn—and likes it? You might be surprised. VIOLET BLUE reports on the pleasures of pressing Play.

Personally, I like my pizza deliveryman to do one thing: bring me my dinner. But mention this guy to a group of women, and, while most of us will think of cheesy pies with tomato sauce, a good number of us will conjure up that hilariously bad porn cliché, the randy fellow who's always ready to accept sex in exchange for a medium sausage and mushroom. Notwithstanding how lame the cliché is, or how simply bad most porn is (and after ten years as a professional reviewer of the stuff, I can report that much of it is very bad), the fact is, millions of women use and enjoy "explicit sexual imagery." What's perhaps more surprising, given the latest scientific research, is that more of us don't.

In the first three months of 2007, according to Nielsen/NetRatings, approximately one in three visitors to adult entertainment Web sites was female; during the same period, nearly 13 million American women were checking out porn online at least once each month. Theresa Flynn, vice president of marketing for Hustler video, says that women account for 56 percent of business at her company's video stores. "And the female audience is increasing," she adds. "Women are buying more porn." (They're creating more of it, too: Female director Candida Royalle's hard-core erotic videos, made expressly for women viewers, sell at the rate of approximately 10,000 copies a month.)

Meanwhile, science is finally buying into the idea that women are at least as stimulated by porn as men. In a 2006 study at McGill University, researchers monitored genital temperature changes to measure sexual arousal and found that, when shown porn clips, men and women alike began displaying arousal within 30 seconds; men reached maximum arousal in about 11 minutes, women in about 12 (a statistically negligible difference, according to the study). Even more compelling were the results of a 2004 study at Northwestern University that also assessed the effect of porn on genital arousal. Mind you, a copy of Buffy the Vampire Slayer and a lubed-up feedback device isn't most girls' idea of a hot night in. But when the researchers showed gay, lesbian, and straight porn to heterosexual and homosexual women and men, they found that while the men responded more intensely to porn that mirrored their particular gender orientation, the women tended to like it all. Or at least their bodies did.

But that's the hitch: Even when our bodies respond to what we're seeing, not every woman feels empowered to enjoy the show. For years we've been told that we won't—or shouldn't—be turned on by porn, end of story, sleep tight. The message has come from all sides—from conservative Christian organizations ("Traditionally, women are far more likely to engage in wistful, romantic fantasies than crude scenes of people engaging in sexual acts," Kathy Gallagher, co-founder of Pure Life Ministries, has written) to the radical feminist Catharine MacKinnon (who says porn exploits and discriminates against women, and encourages rape). When everyone tells you that what you might be curious about, or even secretly like, is wrong, bad, sleazy, and shameful, you don't have to cast a line very far to land a set of inhibitions.

And, indeed, many a smart, strong, sexually self-reliant girl has popped in a porn DVD and ejected it just as quickly because she saw something that offended her or made her uncomfortable. I've heard from many women that they don't like the sense of being "out of control" they get from watching porn—that disconnect between how their body is feeling and what their brain is telling them is acceptable. I like to remind these women that porn won't make you do anything you didn't already want to do before you pressed Play on the Edward Penisbands DVD.

I've also heard, plenty of times, that porn degrades women. That argument always makes me wonder about gay male porn, which lots of women appreciate for all its hunky hotties in flagrante. If heterosexual porn degrades women, does gay porn degrade men? What about porn made by women—is that degrading, too? For me, the real problem with most porn is its hokeyness—the ridiculous costumes, the awful cinematography, the ludicrous story lines, the terrible acting (not to mention how scary the close-ups sometimes look, how fake the boobs are, how some starlets really sound like injured animals...).

And yet in my research and experience, the biggest roadblock for women (and men) to enjoying explicit imagery is the fear that they don't "stack up" to the bodies and abilities of the people on-screen. Erotic models and actresses bring up a whole range of adequacy issues, from breast size to weight, from what you look like "down there" to the adult acne we all periodically fight.

But it's worth remembering that if porn performers looked like you and me, they'd be out of a job. They're abnormally thin, they get cosmetic surgery literally (and sometimes frightfully) from head to toe, they have makeup in places you'd be surprised makeup can be applied, they shave and wax everything imaginable, and they're weirdly flexible. They occupy a tiny end of the gene pool, and that's why they're capable of acting out fantasy sex.

Though I've sometimes felt that my job as a porn reviewer (for Web sites like fleshbot.com) is akin to being a canary in a bad-taste boys' club mine shaft, I've seen a change in quality in the past few years that I think is a direct reflection of the growing female audience. As more discriminating viewers, we've demanded better porn—and lo, it is being made. Women are changing the market. Director Maria Beatty's gorgeously shot movies (all of which feature strictly lesbian action) look like 1920s noir films with sex, but not explicit sex—just a lot of tease and dreamy outfits and music. And Comstock Films, maker of high-quality, documentary-style, real-couples videos, aggressively markets to women with the simple tagline "Women love real sex."

So just what do we love about it? First, the way it lets us satisfy our very normal, very human sexual curiosity. If you're like me, you're the kind of woman who'll peep at Pam Anderson's new boob job just to see the latest installations. But it's not just what the bodies look like, it's what they look like aroused—and what they can do. Watching people have sex can be fascinating.

Porn is also a fun and versatile toy. Sure, I sometimes feel like I need Google Earth to show me where the good porn is, but once I find it, I can figure out what to do with it faster than you can click Zoom In. Explicit sexual imagery is an aphrodisiac; it sends a direct current buzzing from our brains to our groins. Like a reliable vibrator, it can be a great tool. With porn, women like me get to experiment with making adult choices and trying on new fantasy ideas, just as we might try a different brand of condom for a change. We don't have to think of rationality and animalistic urges

Science
is finally buying into the idea that women are at least as stimulated by porn
as men.

as mutually exclusive. If we desire, we can let them play together like tennis doubles. Porn is one more pleasure to add to life's sexual buffet, one that can be enjoyed with a partner or alone. And if Shaving Ryan's Privates winds up giving you more giggles than orgasms, then the only casualty is...Ryan's privates. Q

We Are Curious, Violet Blue...

The author of The Smart Girl's Guide to Porn (oy!) shares her choices for what's worth watching.

Suspecting that A Clockwork Orgy probably isn't as good as its namesake, we asked porn reviewer Violet Blue to recommend a starter kit of quality adult films. (Blue also suggests visiting Web sites such as sugardvd.com and greencine.com, both of which offer diverse video selections and stringent privacy policies.)

Comstock Films's REAL PEOPLE, REAL LIFE, REAL SEX series: Each movie in this series focuses on one actual couple. "Director Tony Comstock shows what it looks like when two people who are in love have sex," says Blue. "It's beautiful—the antithesis of shapeless, boring porn in which everyone is just going through the motions."

Cult Epics' VINTAGE EROTICA series: A collection of porn footage from the 1920s through the '50s. Made before the era of boob jobs and tummy tucks, the movies feature stunning, all-natural bodies. "Some of the action is pretty hard-core. The intense sex acts in modern porn aren't so new after all."

CHEMISTRY: Erotica meets reality TV with this series from sex educator Tristan Taormino. The actors—who live together under constant video scrutiny—"are encouraged to do whatever they want with each other," says Blue.

So while the breasts may be fake, the chemistry is real.

THE BI APPLE: Outspoken sex blogger and activist Audacia Ray makes her directing debut with a film about one woman's bisexual exploration. "What sets this apart is that it's got an African-American lead, which you almost never see in porn."

JENNA JAMESON IS THE MASSEUSE: The porn diva stars with her husband in this film about a masseuse who crosses the line with a client. "This one," says Blue, "has strong writing and acting. I was actually curious to see how the story would end."

—Rachel Bertsche